Abstract

This project examines the symbolic use of colour in wedding attire across 200 countries and territories, using an art-based inquiry to create a cohesive map visually representing cultural colour associations. As a globally shared yet culturally distinct event, weddings provide a unique vantage point for exploring identity, tradition, and symbolism. By focusing on wedding attire, this research uncovers patterns, such as the dominance of white in Western societies and much of Latin America, red's deep symbolism in Asia, the prevalence of gold in North Africa and the Middle East, and vibrant colours in sub-Saharan Africa.

A total of 2,748 images were sourced exclusively through Google Image Search. While practical, this method introduced challenges, including the underrepresentation of smaller or marginalized communities, regional gaps in larger, diverse nations like India and Russia, and difficulties representing small island territories. Images were meticulously edited to remove extraneous details and compiled using visual tools such as Adobe Photoshop and Illustrator.

The resulting infographic reveals how history, geographic diversity, and cultural evolution shape the colour and symbolism of wedding attire. It also highlights areas for future research, such as a parallel study on men's wedding attire, the impact of multi-day ceremonies, alternative mapping solutions, and the need for alternative data collection methods, including crowd-sourced imagery and ethnographic collaboration.

Ultimately, this project amalgamates art and research, offering a visually compelling and culturally significant artifact that invites reflection on the shared human experience of weddings and the universal yet varied ways colour communicates identity and tradition.

Introduction

Colour is a universal yet deeply personal experience shaped by cultural, historical, and social contexts. There is significant literature on symbolic meanings of colour across many cultures with written language (Appendix A: Additional Resources). However, colour is a visual element, so these examples should be displayed visually. This project set out to represent the diversity and complexity of cultural colour associations in a single, cohesive map (Appendix B: Full-Scale Image).

Focusing on linguistic terminology limits the analysis of colour when considering factors, including translation, lack of equivalent terminology, cultural nuances, and non-verbal associations that may date back generations with no written origin. We can uncover patterns, regional similarities, and unique traditions that inform colour perceptions by looking at a common event across cultures and how they use colour. Common events found across the globe, such as birth, coming of age, marital unions, and death, often hold a significance that is reflected in their use of colour. Weddings were ultimately chosen for this project due to the amount of available information and that it is conventionally considered to be a joyous celebration. Weddings are recognized as a ceremony that unite two individuals and their families in a partnership (Zhalieva & Abdykadyrova, 2022, 3).

Several factors highlight the importance of weddings for cultural identity and expression. While experiencing these weddings firsthand would give the most accurate representation and collection of data, travelling to 200 countries and sovereign states (Appendix C: List of Countries and Territories Included, Alphabetically) was simply not feasible for this project. As a feasible alternative, images were sourced from a singular data platform: a Google Image search. A communicative infographic was produced through meticulous editing, placement, and cropping to represent the visual identity of culture represented through wedding attire.

Objectives

Culturally Shared Event

The goal is to identify an event or shared symbolism that is as universal as possible while still holding unique cultural meaning. There was an exploration of widely celebrated festivals, such as Holi, Lunar New Year, and variations of Carnival, as well as how spring was welcomed and celebrated across different cultures, but not every culture experiences the same seasons and climate. Use of colours in flags was also considered, considering how every nation and territory has one. However, there was an issue of translation, and some countries either didn't have meanings to their flags or simply made one under the instruction of other nations. The decision was ultimately narrowed down between birth, coming of age, weddings, and death as an event that represents near-ubiquitous cultural experience.

Visual Presentation

To limit biases other than visual interpretation, this representation is displayed without requiring a linguistic explanation to alter or interpret the results. The description of the results and findings is simply an enhancement that provides improved accessibility to those unable to view the full-scale image and zoom in on the details of the infographic. This required a way to display the information: the Mercator projection (Monmonier, 2010) was selected out of numerous charting styles as the most recognized. Some challenges arose in representing small nations, however other solutions could not be integrated within the project's time constraints, which presents areas of future work.

The focus needed to remain on the attire and the colours used. To achieve this, months of meticulous editing to remove personal artifacts, including skin and hair colour and background elements, was needed. Select elements remained in the presentation, such as jewelry and floral additions. Bouquets and handheld items were not included unless they were the same colour as the dress. Floral elements that remained included were floral crowns and garlands. Although male wedding attire is often a significant and visually striking aspect of certain cultures, it was excluded from the imagery to emphasize a notable pattern of contrast between the Western and Latin tradition of white dresses and the colourful wedding attire found in other cultures.

Map Process

This qualitative research used an art-based inquiry (Knowles, 2007, 29) and several creative processes to explore cultural colour perceptions, including collecting, editing, and collaging images. The visual method introduced a new way to interpret existing information and revealed patterns that might remain unnoticed in written exploration. This method allowed the project to transcend linguistic barriers.

A single source of research (Google Image Search) was used for data collection, bypassing the need to identify and justify the algorithmic sources behind individual images. While searching, the key phrase “Traditional wedding attire from ‘country’” was used to make every country search the same. Images were selected in order of first appearance, only leaving out images shared on social media platforms. This project accumulated 2748 images of wedding attire (Appendix D: Sources for Imagery Used). Each country/territory had approximately 16 images to mitigate personal biases, such as individual style choices. Some countries didn’t have enough data to source 16 images, while others had plenty more data to extract. Nauru was the only country for which zero images could be found. Larger countries, such as China, Canada, India, Russia and the United States, had an increased image count of 32 to compensate for significant differences of geographic size. This increase still left data gaps, such as regional differences. India, for example, has style differences that vary significantly between provinces and cities.

Editing the images was the most time-consuming task to ensure accuracy. Several techniques were attempted, including using AI tools, but ultimately, Adobe Photoshop was discovered to be the most precise tool. Colour grading, the process of adjusting and enhancing the colours in an image or video to achieve a specific mood, tone, or visual style, was not adjusted as it became apparent that lighting choices were also affected by region. While most countries chose warmer lighting, such as that of golden hour (the period shortly after sunrise or before sunset when the sunlight is soft, warm, and diffused), Nordic countries, such as Iceland and Sweden, seemed to favour blue hour lighting (the brief period of twilight before sunrise or after sunset when the sky takes on deep blue hues).

Compiling the edited photos onto a map was the most satisfying process: a template (Appendix E: Sources for Regions Included Geographically, 68)

was used to speed up this process. The template was modified to ensure each nation and territory was included, including adding several countries to the map, such as Monaco and Andorra, labelling each layer appropriately and alphabetizing them to minimize the time needed to locate the appropriate layer(s). This was done in Adobe Illustrator to utilize clipping masks, a tool that uses an object or layer to hide parts of other objects, ensuring that overflow from each country would not interfere with their neighbour(s). With this masking technique, image placement could be determined by shape and size instead of colour. Colour influenced placement only when a neighbouring country had a similar style. Border markers were eliminated to allow the colours to operate as the full narrative.

Description of the Map

As outlined in the Visual Presentation section, the primary contribution of this project is the map, which invites audiences to independently interpret global trends without being influenced by the researcher's written analysis. To enhance accessibility and highlight details that might otherwise go unnoticed, this section provides close-ups of the map and observations in writing. The research draws on a foundation of 2,748 images (Fig. 1), offering insights into distinct patterns and trends across geographically diverse regions of the world.

Global Patterns

A total of 2,748 images formed the foundation of this research (Fig. 1).

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Western Traditions:

In Western and many Latin American cultures (Fig. 2), white is the predominant colour for wedding attire.

Variations of Red:

Across much of Asia (Fig. 3), red is a significant colour in wedding attire, often expressed through shades of red and pink that reflect regional traditions.

Multi-day Ceremonies:

In several Asian countries, including India and Thailand, ceremonies often span multiple days (Fernandez, 2011). Brides wear several outfits, typically in shades of red. These multi-day events posed a challenge in determining which outfit to represent visually in this graphic.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Middle Eastern Patterns:

Wedding attire across North Africa and the Middle East (Fig. 4) predominantly features white and gold, with white gowns often embellished with intricate gold detailing, while green also emerged as a frequently used colour.

Regional Observations

Europe

Western Europe:

White bridal attire with minimal adornments was predominant in Western Europe, including the United Kingdom, France, and Germany (Fig. 5).

Fig. 5.

Eastern & Northern Europe:

In Eastern and Northern Europe (Fig. 6), encompassing the Slavic and Scandinavian regions, a gradient of bridal fashion emerged, with dresses increasingly featuring black and red tones as the areas extend further from Europe's center. These colours are deeply rooted in cultural traditions and symbolism, often connected to heritage and folklore. Areas, such as Romania, prominently showcasing black dresses as a distinctive cultural feature.

Fig. 6.

Spain & Portugal:

Spain and Portugal (Fig. 7), located in the Iberian Peninsula, featured darker tones in wedding attire, including black and deep green. Influenced by historical ties to Northern Africa (Boone & Benco, 1999), these styles sharply contrast their northern European neighbours.

Fig. 7.

Sub-Saharan Africa

Below the Sahara (Fig. 8a), wedding attire features vibrant palettes and bold patterns, with colours varying widely between regions. Dresses in this region display bold hues such as red, yellow, blue, green, and pink, often adorned with traditional motifs, beadwork (Fig. 8b), and embroidery. Some areas, such as Botswana and

South Africa, favour indigo, while most African countries use such a diverse array of colours that distinguishing regional boundaries becomes challenging. However, countries such as Angola and Namibia show a higher prevalence of white attire, possibly reflecting colonial influences worth further exploration.

Fig. 8a.

Island Nations & Smaller Territories

Island nations, including the Caribbean islands (Fig. 9) and those in Oceania (Fig. 10), comprise small or multiple islands. This created challenges during image placement, as information often overlapped or was fragmented between islands, reducing clarity. Regions displayed a wide range of vibrant wedding attire alongside white outfits, with dresses reflecting Western influences, and traditional Afro-Caribbean and Indo-Caribbean attire featuring bright colours and intricate patterns. The diverse bridal fashion across the islands illustrates the blending of cultural traditions and modern influences. Although some secluded nations lacked sufficient visual representation.

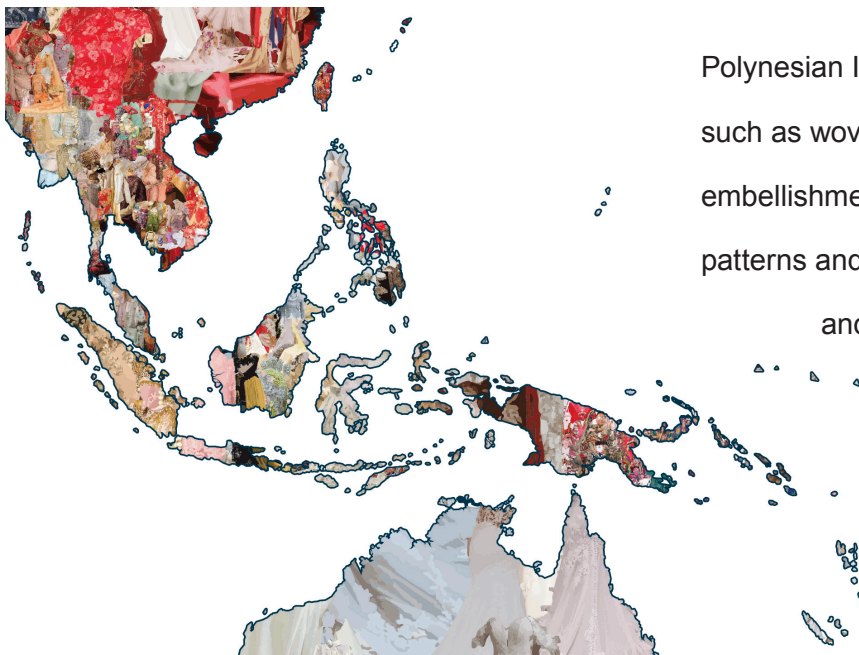

Fig. 9b.

Wedding dresses from the Polynesian Islands incorporate natural materials such as woven fabrics, tapa cloth, and floral embellishments, often adorned with intricate patterns and hand-dyed designs. Vibrant colours and motifs inspired by the ocean, flora, and cultural heritage are prominent, with accessories like garlands of fresh flowers or shells adding a natural elegance.

Strong Indigenous Heritage

Due to their prominent Indigenous visual culture, Peru and Chile (Fig. 10) stand out visually among their South American neighbours. Both countries maintain strong connections to the Indigenous roots of the Andes mountains, with the Mapuche and Aymara predominant in Chile (YON et al., 2020) and Quechua accounting for 83.1% of Peru's Indigenous population (MinorityRights, 2020). This rich heritage contributes to Latin American culture's vibrant and colourful visual identity. These dresses are frequently paired with accessories like handwoven shawls, hats, and beadwork.

Fig. 10.

Spain & Portugal vs. Latin America

The Iberian Peninsula (Fig. 11) and its former colonies in Latin America (Fig. 10) present a contrast. While Spain and Portugal feature darker wedding attire, such as black and deep green, Latin American countries predominantly adopt white dresses influenced by Western traditions. Despite shared colonial histories, these regions developed distinct traditions, highlighting the unique evolution of identities.

Fig. 11.

Limited Representation in Large Countries

Despite collecting as many as 32 images from large nations such as Russia (Fig. 12) and India (Fig. 13), the diversity of regional traditions were too extensive for this project. Russia's size required images to be enlarged, resulting in pixelation, while and geographic variety in countries such as China and India made specific locations impossible to map. E.g., Indian bridal wear varies across states such as Rajasthan, Manipur, and Kerala, each distinguished by colours, patterns, and styles.

Fig. 12.

Fig. 13.

White Face Paint

In Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo (Fig. 14), the Bosniak tradition of painting a bride's face white, adorned with intricate sprays and dots of red, blue, gold, and silver (Bytyci, 2022), remains a custom.

Fig. 14.

Scottish Clan Colours

In contrast to the white gowns customary in Western Europe, Scottish weddings (Fig. 15) uniquely incorporate tartans that represent family clans into their attire and formal ceremonies (Brown, 2010, p. 19). While men typically wear kilts in their clan colours, women, on occasion, proudly showcase tartans that honour either their lineage or their future families'.

Fig. 15.

Future Work

Future Research Directions

This project has opened the door to endless exploration of wedding attire's cultural and symbolic richness, let alone colour. Future research could greatly benefit from direct engagement with local experts, artisans, and cultural historians through interviews or surveys. Firsthand perspectives would provide deeper insight into the traditions and evolution of regional wedding attire, offering a richer understanding of how colours and garments reflect broader cultural values and practices. Ethnographic methods would further illuminate how these traditions are shaped by and continue to shape regional identities.

While this study focused on female wedding attire to contrast the Western white gown, many cultures feature men's wedding attire that is equally, if not more, vibrant and intricate. These garments often hold profound symbolic meaning, offering a glimpse into gender-specific colour symbolism and how cultural perceptions of colour extend beyond the bride. Future research could explore these elements, providing a more comprehensive understanding of wedding traditions as a reflection of cultural identity.

Visual representation also posed significant challenges. The Mercator projection is not a fair representation of smaller nations, such as many of the smaller islands of the Caribbean and Oceania. This led to overlapping images obscuring detail and diversity. Similarly, even with additional data points, larger nations such as Russia, India, and Canada were difficult to represent in their full cultural richness due to their vast regional diversity. Addressing these issues in future projects would allow for a more nuanced and equitable representation of smaller regions and large, culturally diverse nations.

Outstanding Questions

This project raised several significant questions that may warrant further exploration. Search algorithms, for instance, prioritize popular or frequently clicked images, potentially reinforcing stereotypes or overshadowing less mainstream traditions. How can researchers discern and mitigate these biases to ensure authenticity and cultural accuracy in their findings?

Another pressing question involves labelling white wedding dresses as "modern." While these dresses are commonly linked to Western traditions, they often resemble styles in Western Europe and the Americas. This raises an important distinction: are these outfits truly a reflection of modernity, or do they signify Westernization? Exploring this question could show how global influences shape and reshape cultural identities.

Limitations

Future studies should expand data collection by diversifying sources. In addition to Google Image Search, researchers could utilize additional search engines, digital archives, firsthand accounts, and museum collections.

Conclusion

This project's journey into cultural colour associations through wedding attire has illuminated the global patterns and the distinct regional nuances that make these traditions so rich.

White is dominant in Western societies and many parts of Latin America. Red, by contrast, holds profound symbolism in much of Asia. Gold and white dominate bridal attire in North Africa and the Middle East. Sub-Saharan Africa's vibrant patterns and bold palettes speak to the region's geographic, religious, and cultural diversity. Colonial legacies add another layer of complexity, as some nations have adopted or blended the styles of their former colonizers with local traditions, while others, such Including historical artifacts and less-commercialized examples would help create a richer, more representative dataset.

To better capture local nuances, categorizing attire by region or district rather than generalizing at the national level could reduce overgeneralizations and offer a more accurate depiction of wedding traditions. Interactive tools could also enhance the accessibility of this visual artifact. Developing a web-based or virtual reality map would allow users to explore wedding attire in a more immersive and engaging experience.

as Latin America, have differentiated their visual culture and integrated different sources. These colours frame the diversity of differences in colour perceptions across cultures.

This project used a Google Image search to source 2,748 images across 200 countries and territories. This method, while practical, introduced biases in algorithmic prioritization, unintentionally emphasizing popular or mainstream traditions while underrepresenting smaller or marginalized communities. Large, diverse nations such as India, Russia, and China also proved challenging to represent fully, even with an expanded dataset.

Regional intricacies within these nations, such as the distinct bridal styles of India's Rajasthan, Manipur, and Kerala or Russia's diverse ethnic traditions, highlight the limitations of this approach.

Smaller nations and island territories, such as those in the Caribbean and Oceania, faced overlapping data issues due to their geographic scale, further complicating representation.

Despite these challenges, the final infographic captures a snapshot of global wedding attire. It combines historical influences, modern adaptations, and regional variations into a cohesive visual. Weddings are an significant vantage point for exploring identity, tradition, and cultural expression through colour.

Looking ahead, this project opens the door to further research into the cultural perception of colour. Expanding data collection to include crowd-sourced imagery, direct collaboration with local experts, and incorporating interactive mapping tools would create a more inclusive and detailed representation. Investigating the impacts of colonial legacies, the symbolism of men's attire, and the role of colour in multi-day ceremonies could also enrich future studies.

Ultimately, this project serves not only as a research outcome but also as an invitation for reflection. The map is a visual and cultural artifact that bridges the gap between art and academia. It encourages viewers to consider the shared human experience of colour while appreciating the unique ways we communicate identity, tradition, and symbolism.

Appendix A: Additional Resources

Books like The World According to Color (Fox, 2022) and The Secret Lives of Colour (St. Clair, 2017) explore how different cultures perceive and interpret colours. For example, while white is often associated with purity and weddings in Western traditions, in Eastern and Southern Asian cultures, white represents death and mourning (St. Clair, 2017, p. 41). This highlights how cultural contexts can dramatically shape the meaning of colour.

Chromophobia (Batchelor, 2000) delves into cultural attitudes toward colour, particularly in Western societies, where colour has sometimes been viewed as superstitious or even threatening. On the other hand, Interaction of Color (Albers, 2013) explores how colours interact and influence our perception of them. Albers reminds us that colour is rarely seen in isolation unless viewed through special instruments, emphasizing that the emotional or psychological impact of colour often depends on its relationship with surrounding colours and the environment.

In Colour: The Secret Influence (Fehrman & Fehrman, 2004), the psychological effects of colour are examined, showing how colours can influence emotions and decision-making. The book also explains how different species perceive colour differently based on eye variations, such as cones and rods, and explores topics like colorblindness, which affects human perception.

For artists and designers, books like Colour, Second Edition: A Workshop for Artists and Designers (Hornung, 2012) and The Designer's Guide to Colour Combinations (Cabarga, 1999) provide insights into achieving colour harmony and applying design principles effectively. These resources help readers understand how to create aesthetically pleasing and functional designs by combining colours thoughtfully.

Wildflowers of the Mountain West (Anderson et al., 2012) takes a different approach, connecting natural environments to cultural aesthetics. It explores how local pigments derived from plants and minerals influence regional colour palettes, showcasing how nature shapes cultural and artistic expressions of colour.
